Who wants to be a ...

... TV licence investigator?

What the job involves

- Visiting homes where it is suspected that people are not paying for their TV licence.
- Finding out whether they are watching TV without a licence.
- Sometimes going to court to testify against these people.

Advantages of the job

- You can manage your own time and decide when you will make your visits.
- A salary of £10,000 and the chance to earn more in bonuses.
- You can work from home or outdoors.
- You will be given complete training.
- You will receive a pension.

Disadvantages of the job

- You may well have to deal with rude or abusive people who aren't too happy to see you!
- You will probably have to work evenings and weekends to catch people when they are at home.
- You need your own transport.
- You may have to go to court.

How would you advertise this job to attract lots of applicants?

Manage your own time ... and reap the reward

£10,000 basic, with additional uncapped earnings potential, pro rata
Part time positions only are available

Working from home and managing your own time are just some of the perks of being an Enquiry Office for Ensignia. If you are looking for the chance to be your own boss and manage your own time, have a realistically achievable earnings package, the backing of a household name and work outdoors then this could be the role for you.

You will be given a specific territory in which to investigate television licence evasion by knocking on doors and then using your well developed people skills to handle unpredictable and sometimes tricky situations.

The job requires resilience and flexibility, as you will be dealing with a variety of people and circumstances.

Also a flexible approach will be needed which will be matched by your attendance pattern in order to maximise face to face customer contact.

To be successful in this interesting and autonomous role, you will need to have good negotiation skills and combine patience with diplomacy and sensitivity. There will also be a persuasive element in the role so a sales/customer service or operational background may help. However, common sense and tact are character traits that are essential.

Complete training and a pension are among the benefits you will receive. In return you must have your own transport and be accountable for reporting and may even be required to appear in court.
